Today's truism is that Energy is going to cost much more in the immediate, medium and long-term future and that is going to hit your businesses profits!

No-one can have escaped the fact that the cost of energy is rising rapidly. Only 12 months ago most building owners and users were not interested in energy use firstly because it was very cheap and secondly someone else was paying for it!

How things have changed. One almost senses a rising panic and fear of where the cost of energy will rise to and when will it stop or stabilise and how it will affect businesses profitability.

So you know the cost of energy is rising and you understand the impact on your business. However, you can't get real-time access to this information, you have no idea which plant or systems are costing you the most to run at anytime, if you could access this data you wouldn't be able to interpret it, probably, and if you could there probably is not much you could do about it. How bad does it have to get?

Why is this? Well, maybe it is because most energy metering information is not owned by the user, it is not supplied in real-time, equipment does not report its own energy usage directly and there is no connectivity between the operational requirements of the building, the costs requirements of the business occupying it and the buildings systems themselves.

Why not? No technical reason that's for sure. It is mainly because cost masquerading as price always seems to focus on the least cost/price solutions being specified and delivered. So you get what you pay for, automated systems that are more proprietary than open unable to deliver vital information you need, integrated into networks that cannot deliver vital data directly into business management/enterprise systems and little to no real-time optimisation of the plant you own or use.

CNS can offer a way out with solutions that pay for themselves very quickly and impact positively that bottom line profit as well as keeping the world a little healthier.
